Red Cross Seeks Funds For Victims

The Appomattox County Chapter of the American Red Cross is making a special appeal for funds to aid hurricane and flood victims of recent hurricane Camille.

Local Chapter Chairman, William A. Hunter, stated that National Red Cross headquarters has asked the Appomattox Chapter to raise $131.00 as its share of a six million dollar goal. This request was made by the National Chapter before the extensive damage of flash floods in Nelson and surrounding counties. This quota will be increased due to great need in Virginia communities as a result of foods and landslides that destroyed so many homes and business establishments. Citizens have contributed large amounts of food and clothing but money is needed to help these victims rebuild their homes.

Donations should be made to American Red Cross and sent to William A. Hunter, Chairman or Mrs. Willie S.Moses, Home Service Chairman, Appomattox, Virginia.

County Rushes Aid To Flood Victims

Nearby Counties Are Stricken

Appomattox people were shocked and saddened last Wednesday and Thursday by the tremendous destruction in life, housing and property in the wake of flash flooding in Central Virginia. The James River rolled 22 feet out of its banks in western and central portions of Virginia with the Tye River and other streams and tributaries also overflowing causing the worst flood conditions in years.

The storm seemed to center over the little community of Massies Mill in Nelson County. Thousands of persons were either marooned on the roofs of their homes or in trees or had been evacuated to higher points along the paths of the raging rivers and tributaries.

Locally, the response to the tragedy was immediate. Civic and church organizations have taken truck loads of clothing and food to the stricken areas. Bank funds have been set up to help the victims, and everywhere people offer sympathy to the families who have suffered the loss of loved ones.

The floods were born of the rainy remnants of hurricane Camille which left widespread destruction in Mississippi and other states in the Gulf Coast area.

James A. Smith, extension agent for Appomattox prepared a report on crop damage for the Governor of Virginia. In the report he included the loss of six acres of tobacco, nine head of beef cattle and 600 bales of hay, a total monetary loss of about $8500.

This street in Gladstone looks more like a canal for a gondola, but for Mrs. William McFadden (above) and the rowboat operator, Charles Wayne Brown, it was serious business as Gladstone residents prepared for the rising waters of the James River, following Tuesday's (Aug. 19) unusally heavy rains which caused widespread flooding. Mrs. McFadden, arriving home from work at Appomattox Garment Co., on Wednesday, moved furniture and belongings (with help from Mr. McFadden and others) out of her home (at right) - then could only stand back and watch the water cover flower beds, grass and shrubbery, threatening the porch and interior of the home. Residents of Gladstone and Bent Creek, although suffering heavy damage from the water, appeared philosophical about their losses while comparing them with the infinitely greater losses suffered in other sections of Nelson County.

Jaycees of Appomattox, Farmville and their other concerned friends in many organizations in this county – the Appomattox Rescue Squad, Fire Department, Delta Zeta Chapter, Beta Sigma Phi, Woodmen of the World, church organizations, FHA, Tri-Hi-Y, and others worked many long hours Wed., Thurs. and on through this week to box up clothing, food and furniture for stricken victims of flooding in neighboring counties. Additional supplies are being collected at the Rescue Squad Bldg. and the Jaycees have established a bank fund at Fidelity National Bank, Appomattox, where money gifts may be given. The Jaycees plan to use the money for special projects to help rebuild the area: In the photo above, a full load of clothing was in the larger truck and Rothgeb's pickup was full of food ready for a trip to Norwood (Nelson County) where the worst of the flood damage occurred in Virginia.

by R. E. McClenny Soil Conservationist

The recent flood caused by hurricane Camille was a terrible shock to Virginia. We in Appomattox County got about 1 to 1 1/2 inches of rainfall, while the counties to the north received from 5 to 10 inches of rain in one night. The main flood damage to local property was caused by the James River. Some flooding along creeks entering the river was a result of the river flowing up the creeks.

Sunday I went with a group from Pamplin to Nelson County to assist with the recovery operations. Unless you saw it, it is hard to imagine the damage at Roseland and Massies Mill. The flood plains along the Tye River and other streams filled with mud, rock, broken timber, homes, cars, etc. Is aw roads and bridges washed out, power poles sheared off, and building foundations overturned.

If we had received as much rain as Nelson County, we probably wouldn't have had as much damage because our terrain is much flatter and the runoff rate would be less, but we would have had considerable flooding. We don't have as many homes and utilities in the flood plains, but we have some subject to flooding. The Appomattox River, Cub Creek and Vaughans Creek have flooding potential that could cause serious damage. With all of the dry years we have tended to ignore flood danger and develop flood plains for homes, industry and utilities. The probably frequency of having another such 6-10 inch rain in one night is estimated to be about once in a hundred years, but no one knows when floods will strike.

There are several things that can be done to reduce flood damage. The best would be to prohibit building in the flood plain. Some counties have flood plains zoned out to prevent building there. This zoning would not give any protection to utilities and agriculture.

Small watershed reservoirs that store floodwater and gradually release it will reduce damage. These projects will give protection to roads, bridges, and utilities. One of the objectives of the Robert E. Lee Soil and Water Conservation District is to assist local watershed associations in developing the watershed project.

For details on small watershed projects or locating flood plains contact the office of the Soil Conservation Service.

Damaged Trees

Flood and landslide damaged trees throughout central and western Virginia have a ready market in most of the areas had hit by flooding last week.

Many people temporarily unemployed in flood stricken areas because of closed factories and flooded crop land are finding ready cash by cleaning up damaged trees and cutting pulpwood for delivery to Westvaco woodyards throughout the James River Basin and Piedmont section of the state, according to H. E. Matics, wood department manager for Westvaco Corp., in Covington.

"Thirteen Westvaco woodyards in Virginia escaped serious damaged during the flooding but the surrounding country side is littered with pine and hardwood trees which we hope will not be allowed to go to waste," Matics said.

Two other wood buying yards operated by Westvaco at Howardsville and Pemberton on the banks of the James River were badly damaged. Equipment and property loss is estimated at over $50,000. Most of the logs at the yard had previously been shipped to the company's large paper mill in Covington. Repairs at the two damaged yards have started and they are expected to reopen within ten days.

Matics said that the hardest struck areas where thousands of trees were felled by flooding Aug. 27-29 were east of the Blue Ridge Mountains in the James River Basin.

Westvaco woodyards operating in the flooded areas are at Gordonsville, Ivy, Kelly Lynchburg, Caskie, Bent Creek Dillwyn, Natural Bridge and Covington.
